

PSYCHOLOGICAL AND ACMEOLOGICAL PECULIARITIES OF MILITARY MEMBERS' PROFESSIONAL GROWTH

KONSTANTIN V. STVOLYGIN

PhD of History, Associate Professor,

The Chair of Psychology and Conflictology, Branch of Russian State University in the city of Minsk, Republic of Belarus;

21, ul.Narodnaya, Minsk, 220107, Republic of Belarus;

E-mail: konstvol@mail.ru

The author presents theoretical analysis of the psychological and acmeological characteristics of military members' professional growth. We present specific features of military service and possible deformations of the military member's individuality, which can greatly hinder his professional growth. The study covers prospects of investigating military acmeology problems. It is noted that the process of becoming a professional military member has an extremely complex and controversial character. The efficiency of this process largely depends on true knowledge and full consideration of specific features of military service that affect the soldiers' psyche. Applied aspect of the problem under study can be implemented to solutions of practical problems of acmeological and psychological support for professional development of military staff.

Keywords: Military acmeology; Military members; Professional development; Professional deformation of personality.